Beginnings: A Memoir

The second volume of Horton Foote’s memoirs, entitled Beginnings, was published late last year by Scribner. It is a treasury of homespun recollections about his life after leaving home at the tender age of 17 to study acting at the Pasadena Playhouse. Although Foote’s literary style is frequently described as Chekhovian, the young writer’s emerging dramatic aesthetic was profoundly influenced by three Ibsen plays performed by Eva La Gallienne’s repertory company at the Biltmore Theatre in Los Angeles in March 1933. These plays affected him more deeply than any he had ever seen or read before. “Most plays,” he realized after seeing Ibsen, “were thin gruel, of little substance.”

Jody Schwartzberg announced in early March that Eva Le Gallienne was coming to the Biltmore Theater in Los Angeles to do three Ibsen plays. She advised everyone to go and see them all, but if you could only see one, make it Hedda Gabler[ ... ]

The theatre was packed. There was a string trio in the orchestra pit that played when the lights in the auditorium were lowered and before the curtain was raised. The orchestra played, as I remember, “Valse Triste.” When they quit playing, the audience applauded and the musicians left and there was silence. I had never seen or read an Ibsen play before. I didn’t know what to expect, and I was in no way prepared for the reaction I had. The curtain was raised and there was a living room and Tessman’s Aunt Julia, and a maid telling us about the newly married Tessmans. Then Hedda Tessman, Miss Le Gallienne, appeared. She was wearing a short skirt, smoking, as I remember, her hair in a short bob and the audience applauded as she entered.

I watched no one else from then on whenever she was on the stage. It was impossible, it seemed to me, not to watch her. She was compelling and brought a kind of restless energy to the part that at times could be frighteningly cruel and at other times she seemed so vulnerable and frightened. I have never forgotten the way she said the word bored, or how she insulted her husband’s aunt by pretending she thought the aunt’s new bonnet belonged to the maid, how she manipulated her friend Thea, how she threatened to burn her hair, how she destroyed Eilert’s manuscript, how she reacted to the news of Eilert’s death, and how she took the threats of Judge Brock to blackmail her and use her. How I felt, not knowing what was going to happen, when I heard the pistol shot offstage and learned she had killed herself. Mind you it is 67 years since I saw this production, and yet parts of her performance are as vivid to me now as when I first saw them. In a very fundamental way it changed my life. What I saw on the stage that night made me determined from then on to somehow spend my life in the theatre.

Eva Le Gallienne and the Pasadena Playhouse
Remembering Wharton, Texas

The following is excerpted from an essay written by Horton Foote scholar Marion D. Castleberry, in which he explores the playwright's uncanny ability to "fashion the history and stories of the region—coastal southeast Texas—into plays with both personal and universal resonance." Castleberry's essay is published in Horton Foote: A Casebook, edited by Gerald C. Wood (Garland, 1998).

The first-born son of Albert Horton Foote, Sr., and Harriet Gautier (Brooks) Foote, Albert Horton Foote is descended from two of the oldest and best-known families in Texas.

His maternal great-grandfather was John Brooks, whose aristocratic ancestors immigrated to America from Gloucester, England, in the 1600s, where they had been affluent merchants, doctors, and lawyers. His maternal great-grandmother was Harriet Gautier Brooks, whose parents (Peter William and Elizabeth Gautier) were among the first settlers of the Texas Gulf Coast as well as the region's most prominent land-owning family. Although John Brooks, a businessman and community leader, prospered until the Civil War, the post-war drop in cotton prices threw him into bankruptcy. He died on October 4, 1870, leaving his wife and five children alone and penniless. Fortunately, Harriet Brooks was a strong matriarch who kept her children fed and instilled in them a deep respect for their familial heritage. Her courage and resourcefulness became legend in the family stories passed down to Horton Foote...

From his father as well as the other members of his extended family in Wharton, Texas, Foote inherited his homeplace's greatest resource: storytelling. A quiet and polite child, he intently observed everything around him, especially narratives about the past: "My father loved to speculate about the past, what might have happened if this had happened or why did this happen this way. I know that's where I got my own curiosity and speculative nature." No truth or speculation, he remembers, was withheld from him: "I was never told to leave the room no matter how gruesome or unhappy the tale and so early on I learned to accept the tragic events of the past were constantly being reorganized and shaped by the storyteller's imagination: "I've learned that you can hear the same story told by six or seven people, and even though they think it's the same story, it's not. Every version is personal, subjective, and all of them are telling the truth as they see it." In such multiple narratives Foote discovered a way to reveal the inner lives of his characters and the drama between speakers...

At the end of the war, Horton Foote had been a playwright for more than five years. He had seen his dreams of becoming a Broadway actor give way to the truth that his genius came from writing, not acting. He had written a half dozen plays, most of them produced in Off-Broadway theatres, and he had begun experimentation with various theatrical forms. Over the years, he had learned his craft from varied and unexpected sources— from his Russian acting teachers, from Mary Hunter and the American Actors Company, from great choreographers like Agnes De Mille, Martha Graham, and Valerie Bettis, from other writers, and from productions of his own plays. Each of his experiences played an important part in his early career and influenced all his subsequent writing.

Yet no matter how diverse his writing has become, the source of his creativity has always been Wharton, Texas. Foote was fascinated at an early age by the people around him—living and dead—how they lived and died, loved and lost, prevailed and endured. The dramatic tension between their inner lives and their appearance of decorum and calm made profound impressions on him. Today, his homeplace still inspire his writing. The cotton fields, the pecan trees, the front porch swings, the cemeteries, the dwindling towns—images of his youth—move poignantly through his plays. They testify to the brutality, beauty, and mystery of life, to the universals discovered in the particular reality of a small Texas town and its people.
Linda’s Luscious Lone Star Gumbo

Should you find yourself coming away from Getting Frankie Married—and Afterwards with an urge to sample some authentic seafood gumbo that’s also delicious (unlike the dubious concoction served up by Georgia Dale Ratliff in the play), here’s a version guaranteed to please even the pickiest palate.

1 1/2 cups lard or vegetable oil
1 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1 large onion, chopped
1 medium green bell pepper, chopped
1/2 cup chopped celery
4 medium garlic cloves, finely minced
4 qts. seafood stock*
2 lbs. uncooked heads-on shrimp, peeled, heads and shells reserved
2 bay leaves
1/2 medium lemon, seeds removed
1 Tbsp. minced flat-leaf parsley

Melt lard or oil in heavy Dutch oven or 12" skillet over medium heat. When fat is hot, add flour all at once; stir or whisk quickly to combine. If necessary, use back of wooden spoon to smooth out any lumps of flour. Reduce heat to low. Cook, stirring or whisking constantly, until roux is a dark mahogany color, about 55 minutes. (Don’t rush this step. Scorched roux has a bitter flavor and should be discarded.)

Add onion, bell pepper, celery and garlic to skillet; cook for about 5 minutes until onion is transparent. Meanwhile, bring stock (or clam juice and water, if you insist) to a rolling boil in a large saucepan or stockpot. Tie reserved shrimp heads and shells and bay leaves in a cheesecloth bag. Add bag and lemon half to boiling stock. Slowly whisk roux into boiling stock until all has been added. Add parsley, thyme, black pepper, cayenne, and salt. Reduce heat; simmer 1 hour. Remove and discard cheesecloth bag and lemon half. Add shrimp, crabmeat, fish, and scallops. Cook over medium heat 15 minutes. Taste and adjust seasoning as needed. To serve, spoon gumbo over 1/2 cup cooked rice. Add about 1/4 tsp. filé powder to each serving and sprinkle with chopped green onions and parsley. Makes 8-10 servings.

*There is nothing comparable to the flavor of real, honest-to-goodness seafood stock, which is made by slowly simmering 5 lbs. of mixed fish bones and carcasses with onions, cloves, celery, garlic, lemon, peppercorns, and a box of shrimp and crab boil for several hours. If you don’t think you can handle that, try substituting 8 (8-oz.) bottles of clam juice and 2 qts. water.
Playwrights will be in residence for one week of rehearsal for these script-in-hand readings.
