A French Master and an American Original

A conservative, acquisitive middle class, intensely interested in financial aggrandizement, carefully protective of the status quo. Prosperity, rapid growth, wild speculation in the stock market. A deep distrust of foreigners and foreign influence. The compelling topics of the day are money, property, fashion and entertainment.

This was the world Eugène Labiche lived in and wrote about, Second Empire France, 1848-1870.

Eugène Labiche (1815-1888) raised the popular form of vaudeville to a level of social portraiture equal to the great satirists, from Molière to Thornton Wilder. A dozen of the 175 plays he wrote have remained perennial favorites on European stages for a century and a half. He is rarely performed in the United States, however. “Too French” is the usual charge.

Labiche is recognized as a master of comic plot and action, two essential traits of “high” vaudeville (the genre can be generally described as fast-moving comic farce with songs). But of equal interest are his razor-sharp portraits of a self-satisfied middle class whose elaborate schemes to advance its own financial or social positions form the basis of his best plays. He sketches his characters with humor and understanding, but above all with accuracy. Labiche managed to enjoy popular, critical and financial success in his career. He was elected to the Académie Française in 1880.

His play An Italian Straw Hat opened in Paris on Aug. 14, 1851 at the Palais-Royal, one of the city’s best vaudeville venues. The theatre manager was so certain the play was going to fail that he left town the morning of the opening, unable to witness the disaster. But the play was an enormous success. Publicity was much enhanced by the fact that during a performance one of the spectators, a corpulent gentleman, collapsed choking in the aisle and was carried from the theatre. He had died laughing.

The original, like the vaudeville model popular through the latter half of the 19th century, included music and song. The songs were popular tunes of the day, well known to the audience. Labiche and one of his collaborators (he seldom worked alone) rewrote the lyrics, usually comic. Americans should recognize the genre: it is the direct ancestor of George Kaufman’s scripts for the Marx Brothers films, among other 20th century classics.

The present version is an adaptation, set in New York at the turn of the 20th century, and features new music and new lyrics. I have taken many liberties with the text, but I have tried throughout to be faithful to the spirit of the original. This version is meant as a loving homage to Eugène Labiche and the High Vaudeville style he was instrumental in establishing a century and a half ago.

The Life and Work of Eugène Labiche

Born in 1815 to a middle-class family, Eugène Labiche was educated for a career in the law but like fellow playwrights Congreve, Goethe and Anouilh among many others, Labiche abandoned the bar to pursue a life in letters. Labiche tried his hand at short stories, a novel, and even theatre criticism before he found his way to playwriting.

That was not an easy choice for Labiche to make. For centuries the theatre had labored under a distasteful reputation, and was considered to be a profession unsuited to moral stability and domestic happiness. So, when Labiche married, he promised his wife’s parents that he would renounce the theatre. A year later, seeing her husband unhappy, Madame Labiche is said to have placed his pen in his hand herself and absolved him of that vow – most likely thus preserving the strength of their wedding vows. Monsieur Labiche thanked her by dedicating the first edition of his complete works to his beloved wife.

In 1838 Labiche saw the first two productions of his plays, a drama called L’avocat Loubet and a vaudeville Monsieur de Coyllin, ou L’homme infiniment poli at the Palais Royal. A series of plays followed, often written with acknowledged collaborators as was the common practice of the time. The series reached its peak with Un Chapeau de paille d’Italie, or in English, An Italian Straw Hat.

The Hat was a hit. The theatre manager who produced it had feared the worst, but audiences leapt to their feet to applaud, and the play ran for an extraordinary 300 performances. A run of that length was unheard of in the mid-19th century. After such a splendid demonstration of his unique talents and the wholehearted public embrace they met, Labiche became the pre-eminent comic writer of his generation.

Labiche spent the next 25 years crafting comedy after comedy. He chose the bourgeois society of his day as his principal subject, and his audiences crowded in to see themselves and their neighbors reflected on the stage in high comic relief. Among his many successes, Célimare le bien-aimé (1863), Le Voyage de M. Perrichon (1860), La Grammaire, Un Pied dans le crime and La Cagnotte (1864) were some of the best.

In 1877 Labiche retired to central France and took up a life of a gentleman farmer. Far from Paris, no longer writing new plays, Labiche expected his theatrical career to lapse gently into obscurity. But a visit from his friend Emile Augier brought Labiche a second wind. Reading a selection of Labiche’s vast body of work in the farmhouse library, Augier recognized a gold mine.

Augier wheedled, coaxed and persuaded until he finally convinced Labiche to publish his collected comic plays. The resulting ten volumes were released in 1878 and 1879, and their success was exhilarating.

Labiche’s reputation rose to such exalted heights that the following year he was elected to the Académie Française, the elite body of 40 handpicked people known as “the immortals.” Those forty seats are occupied by the leading literary, scientific and scholarly minds of their generation, who are charged with judgment on matters pertaining to the French language.

Labiche died in 1888 and is buried in Montmartre. But his work, as you will see, has a great deal of life in it yet.
A Well-Dressed Era

Travel back in time to New York City just after the turn of the century. Horse-drawn vehicles competed with new automobiles for space on crowded streets lined with the pillars of gas streetlamps. Gibson Girls and Victorian ladies nodded their greetings to frock-coated men wearing mutton-chop sideburns. Theodore Roosevelt occupied the White House, the New York Highlanders (later called Yankees) played baseball at Hilltop Park in northern Manhattan, and George B. McClellan Jr. was the Mayor of New York.

What might you notice if you gazed out a parlor window to the boulevard below? In all the abundant street life of New York, from babes in arms to the oldest citizens and in every social class or walk of life, everybody, bar none, wore a hat. At that time ladies of social standing had hats for every conceivable occasion, and might easily be expected to change hats several times per day. This was a prosperous era for milliners, who sold ready-made hats as well as designing and custom-building them to order.

To be seen anywhere in public without a hat was the grossest breach of good manners, especially for a woman. A bare head was considered gravely immodest, shaming the hatless one and making everyone around her terribly uncomfortable – much as we might feel if confronted with public nudity today. One record tells of a young lady venturing out to send a letter without her hat, and being severely reprimanded for not being appropriately dressed. The mailbox was situated just a few yards from her front gate.
“The hat is the ultimum moriens [last bastion] of respectability.”
Oliver Wendell Holmes

“One must always wear a hat when lunching with people whom one does not know well. One appears to one’s best advantage.”
Coco Chanel

“It is impossible for a hatless woman to be chic.”
Emily Post

“At afternoon funerals, wear a frock coat and top hat. Should the funeral be your own, the hat may be dispensed with.”
The Cynic’s Rules of Conduct, 1905

“A gentleman never sits in the house with his hat on in the presence of ladies for a single moment. Indeed, so strong is the force of habit that a gentleman will quite unconsciously remove his hat on entering a parlor, or drawing room, even if there is no one present but himself. People who sit in the house with their hats on are to be suspected of having spent most of their time in barrooms and similar places.”

Two Kinds of Vaudeville

American Vaudeville

VARIETY format. American vaudeville presented a mixed bill of individual, unrelated acts, including music, dance, comedy, short plays, monologues, trained animals, acrobats, clowning, female and male impersonators and child prodigies.

The songs performed in American vaudeville had original tunes and lyrics. They often became popular “standards.”

American vaudeville was popular from the early 1880s to the 1930s.

What Americans call Vaudeville, the French call Variétés.

Highlighted the work of the PERFORMER, especially the comedians who wrote their own material.

Top American vaudevillians included the Marx Brothers, Charlie Chaplin, Bill “Bojangles” Robinson, Sophie Tucker, Abbott & Costello, Fred Astaire, Laurel & Hardy and many others who went on to film stardom.

Chief characters in American vaudeville acts were the “common man” and woman, often working class or unemployed, underpaid, scrambling and scratching for a living.

French Vaudeville

NARRATIVE format. French vaudevilles such as An Italian Straw Hat: A Vaudeville, are comic plays with songs, that tell stories.

The songs in French vaudevilles had original lyrics but were restricted by law to use only well-known existing tunes, until 1837 when enforcement of that law became impossible.

Vaudeville plays were popular in France from about 1800 to about 1880; the French form of vaudeville was declining while the American form was picking up speed.

What the French call Vaudeville, the Americans call situation comedy or farce, or both. Those plays always include songs, one of the hallmarks of French vaudeville.

Highlighted the work of the PLAYWRIGHT, though beloved comic actors were showcased in the plays.

Top French vaudevillian playwrights included Eugene Scribe, Edmond Gondinet, Jean-François Alfred Bayard and our own Eugène Marin Labiche.

Chief characters in French vaudeville plays were bourgeois, middle class, economically comfortable but still very concerned with money, and even more concerned with manners and propriety.
