Inspiration for Little Black Shadows

A recent report from the Southern Poverty Law Center, Teaching Hard History: American Slavery, found that many young people know little about slavery’s origins in the United States and the government’s role in perpetuating it, incorrectly assuming it was confined to the south and neglecting to address that slavery depended on the ideology of white supremacy. This is perpetuated by nearly all textbooks on civil rights, which accentuate heroes like Harriet Tubman and neglect the varied experiences of enslaved people. One of playwright Kemp Powers’ inspirations for writing Little Black Shadows was discovering the volumes of slave narratives from the Federal Writer’s Project. From 1936-38, more than 2,300 slave narratives were collected and eventually gathered into the 17-volume Slave Narratives: A Folk History of Slavery in the United States from Interviews with Former Slaves. When Powers first encountered these, they were only available in book form, but in the last few years, the entire collection has been published via the Library of Congress at: www.loc.gov/collections/slave-narratives-from-the-federal-writers-project-1936-to-1938. Powers was struck by the largely positive recollections of a brutal institution, even by those who were at the receiving end of regular abuse. He sought to write a play that deals with this kind of internalized racism. Below are some excerpts from this extensive collection.

“Charles and Milly Green was my dad-dy and mammy. Daddy’s overseer was a man named Green, and dey said he was a powerful sort of man. I never did know what it was dey lived when Daddy was borned. Mammy’s master was a lawyer dat dey called Slickhead Mitchell, and he had a plantation at Helicon Springs. Mammy was a house gal and they treated her right good. Now Daddy, he done field work. When you was a slave you had to do anything and evvything your master told you to. You was jus’ obliged to obey your master no matter what he said for you to do. If you didn’t, it was mighty bad for you.”

–Alice Green

“We never knew anything, but work. Of course, when we got sick we were given the best medical care possible. People didn’t die, they always got well.”

–Heard Griffin

“I was born in 1854 in Putnum county. I was born in slavery, my father and mother being owned by Mr. J.W. Mappin. Marse Mappin was not a large slave holder, since he only had about 35 slaves, but he was what we call a ‘coming man’. I do not remember how much land he owned, but nothing like some of the wealthy slave owners. My owner was a comparatively young man, say middle aged, weighing about 190 pounds, with a fairly good education and withal a first rate man. My earliest recollection of him was his perfectly bald head. It looked like a peeled onion. He married a widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Lawson. My owners were very good to their slaves.”

–David Goodman Gullins

“Jedge Harris had er lot of slaves—I specks I kin name er hundred now, dey all lived in log cabins in de quarters and wuz happy an’ well took care of as dey could be. De white folks took me in de house when I wuz little and raised me cuz dey wanted me fer er house boy. I waited on de table, washed dishes, an after I got big enough, I milked de cows. I et in de kitchen out’n young Marse Jimmies plate. I thought so much of him I al-ways et out’n same plate he did. All de other nger cooked and et in de cabins.”

–Manuel Johnson

“Dey used to skeer us out ’bout red ‘taters. Dey was fine ‘taters, red on de outside and pretty and white on de inside, but white folks called ’em ‘nger-killers.’ Dat was one of deir tricks to keep us from stealin’ dem ‘taters. Dere wern’t nothin’ wrong wid dem ‘taters; dey was jus’ as good and healthy as any other ‘taters. Aunt Lucy, she was de cook, and she told me dat slaves was skeered of dem ‘nger-killer’ ‘taters and nev-er bothered ’em much den lak dey does de yam patches dese days.”
