In the fall of 1949, the two-decade civil war between the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and the country’s Nationalist regime finally came to an end. On October 1, Mao Zedong, a communist revolutionary, stood in front of Beijing’s Tiananmen Gate and announced the founding of the People’s Republic. China was now a communist country and Chairman Mao was its leader.

In the aftermath of the civil war, the new Chinese government looked to the Soviet Union—and Joseph Stalin’s planned economy—as a model for their socialist state. Much of the country’s farmland was redistributed in a move towards collectivism and many of its urban centers were reimagined as places of industrial production instead of consumption. To protect the country from the insidiousness of capitalism, the CCP “reeducated” landlords, scientists and the urban elite through forced labor. They discredited Western scholarship and culture, as well, and soon teachers, artists and intellectuals found themselves accused of counterrevolutionary activities. As hardline party ideology became increasingly important to CCP leaders, the punishment for dissident behavior—even unproven—became more severe.

Over the next two-and-a-half decades, Mao reshaped China politically, economically and socially through a variety of drastic campaigns. It was a tumultuous period in the country’s history—and one that changed its culture forever.

Mao Zedong, October 1, 1949.
In May 1942—seven years prior to the establishment of the People’s Republic of China—Mao Zedong delivered his famous “Talks at the Yan’an Forum on Literature and Art.” (At that time, Yan’an, a city in north-central China, was an important base for the CCP.) While speaking to a large group of artists, writers and musicians, Mao proclaimed that culture played a key role in a revolution and that art must not serve the elite, but instead serve the masses. And to reach the masses, the proletariat must be at the center of the stories, not the bourgeoisie. To Mao, the purpose of art was also political and artists were instructed to promote communist principles in all of their work.

In the years to come—particularly during the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s and ’70s—this doctrine would be used to persecute artists and intellectuals who were deemed problematic by the government.

In February 1956, Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev delivered a controversial speech, titled “On the Cult of Personality and Its Consequences,” in which he denounced the tyrannical leadership of the recently deceased Joseph Stalin and condemned, among many other things, Stalin’s purges of Soviet communist party officials in the late 1930s. Khrushchev’s speech reverberated throughout the USSR and it wasn’t long before it reached a worldwide audience—including Chairman Mao, whose own party was engaging in counterrevolutionary purges.

In response to Khrushchev’s speech and the upheaval in Eastern Europe that followed, Mao and the CCP initiated the Hundred Flowers Campaign, which took its name from the line of a famous poem: “Let a hundred flowers bloom, let a hundred schools of thought contend.” The campaign—which, in an effort to distance Mao’s leadership from Stalinism, encouraged the Chinese public to critique the government—began on May 1, 1957. It lasted a mere five weeks, however, because Mao and his party officials had underestimated the public’s grievances. In June, the campaign was abruptly reversed and replaced with an Anti-rightist Campaign that punished many of the dissidents who spoke out during the month of Hundred Flowers. The government’s most vocal critics were fired from their jobs or sent to collective farms or labor camps. The few who were deemed the most dangerous were executed.

An example of one of the propaganda posters used in Mao’s China.
After the failure of the Hundred Flowers Campaign, Mao turned his attention back to China’s economic development. In January 1958, the Great Leap Forward began. This radical campaign—intended to put China’s industrial output ahead of Great Britain’s in just 15 years—authorized the relocation of millions of Chinese citizens to live and work on “people’s communes,” cooperatives set up for farming or manufacturing. The collectives, however, proved ineffective due to poor irrigation techniques, the useless steel produced in the “backyard furnaces” and a series of natural disasters. By 1959, the country had plunged into what would become a devastating famine. Although the total number of deaths remains in contention, scholars estimate that somewhere between 30 and 45 million people died as a result of the Great Leap.

While the disastrous Great Leap Forward didn’t end the CCP’s control of China by any means, it did diminish Mao’s influence within his party. When the campaign was abandoned in 1962, many CCP officials held Mao responsible for its failure. Liu Shaoqi, who was technically the president at the time, tried to reverse the economic downturn by implementing more moderate policies: foreign grain was imported; private farming, to an extent, was allowed again; and restrictions on China’s cultural life were relaxed.

In the early 1960s, Mao—by then relegated to a figurehead position—watched as pragmatism replaced ideological purity. Worst of all, he feared that the party was beginning to promote capitalist principles. In his mind, the CCP needed to be overhauled.

In 1961, historian and government official Wu Han published the final version of Hai Rui Dismissed from Office, his play about a Ming dynasty minister who was sent to prison for criticizing the emperor. The play had been enormously popular when it was performed during the prior year. Even Chairman Mao praised the piece.

But Mao’s closest allies—including his wife, Jiang Qing, and propaganda official Yao Wenyuan—saw the play as a thinly veiled allegory for the downfall of Peng Dehuai. (Peng, China’s former defense minister, was stripped of his position after he criticized Mao and the Great Leap Forward in 1959.) In a scathing essay, Yao called Hai Rui a “poisonous weed which should be criticized.” Other officials within the party believed that the attack on Wu Han—who would die in prison in 1969—was excessive and overly harsh. The party infighting that had begun during the Great Leap had come to a head.

For Mao, the disagreement among the ranks provided the perfect opportunity to set his next plan into motion. With Hai Rui, Wu Han had unwittingly opened the door for Mao’s Cultural Revolution.

Mao’s wife, Jiang Qing, pictured here in 1976, was a harsh critic of Wu Han and would later play an important role in the Cultural Revolution.
To reassert his power—and to purge the CCP of its bourgeois leaders—Chairman Mao, in August 1966, called for a Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. He enlisted the people to help him stamp out corrupt party officials and “class enemies,” such as artists, musicians and intellectuals. Students formed ad-hoc militias, calling themselves Red Guards, in an effort to rid the country of the Four Olds: old customs, old culture, old habits and old ideas.

As the Cultural Revolution gained momentum, the number of Red Guards increased rapidly—especially as young workers and peasants joined the ranks—and their actions became more extreme. They used violent tactics to publicly shame monks, intellectuals, landowners and anyone deemed a counterrevolutionary. They razed temples to the ground and destroyed ancient relics. In one instance, they disinterred the remains of an emperor from the Ming dynasty and burned them. During the 10 years of the Cultural Revolution, at least one million people died at the hands of the Red Guards or in the country’s reeducation camps.

The power struggles within the CCP were also particularly brutal during this era. In 1967, President Liu was purged from the party and arrested. (He would die in prison two years later.) By 1971, Mao and his new apparent successor, Lin Biao, were at odds. Later that year, Lin died in a mysterious plane crash while fleeing the country. The so-called Gang of Four—which included Jiang Qing, Mao’s wife, and Yao Wenyuan, who wrote the essay denouncing Wu Han—became an increasingly powerful presence in the party, especially as Mao’s health declined in the 1970s. Jiang, a former actor, played a particularly important role in the CCP’s attempt to purify the country’s art from both ancient and Western influences. Traditional Chinese operas, for example, were replaced by revolutionary operas that propagandized socialist ideals.

In September 1976, at the age of 82, Mao Zedong died. Although the Gang of Four hoped to retain their power and to continue to enforce their austere policies, Mao’s successor, Hua Guofeng, had them arrested in October and later tried for treason. With their arrest, Mao’s great Cultural Revolution—both symbolically and in practice—was finally at an end.

By now, David Henry Hwang is a grizzled veteran of the American theatre and one of the foremost playwrights of his generation; but his first contact with South Coast Repertory, in the early 1980s, came when he was still an undergraduate at Stanford University. That’s when Jerry Patch, SCR’s then-literary manager, got in touch with Hwang to let him know of SCR’s interest in his early writing. Not long after, Hwang drove down the 405 from his family home in Los Angeles to meet the SCR artistic team, including Patch and artistic directors David Emmes and Martin Benson. Patch remembers Hwang wore a T-shirt and shorts to the meeting. Hwang drove away with one of SCR’s first new-play commissions.

But before Hwang could write a play for SCR, he had to finish another project—a play called M. Butterfly—that would cause his career to skyrocket. It went straight to Broadway after a brief stop in Washington, D.C., with John Lithgow and BD Wong in the leads. It ran for more than two years, earned Hwang a Tony Award for Best Play and, eventually, became a major motion picture starring Jeremy Irons and John Lone. The play’s long international trajectory—along with a couple of other career twists—meant that Hwang wasn’t able to fulfill his SCR commission until the mid-1990s.

The play he finally delivered to SCR, Golden Child, was loosely based on the story of his Chinese great-grandfather’s conversion to Christianity in the early 20th century. It had its world premiere in a co-production by SCR and New York’s Public Theater in 1996-7. After that, another 15 years would go by before Hwang would return to SCR with his play, Chinglish—a comedy about the confusions of language and culture in America and China—in a co-production by SCR and Berkeley Repertory Theatre that went on to a run in Hong Kong.

And now, the relationship that began when Hwang was a shorts-and-T-shirt-wearing kid comes full circle with SCR’s production of M. Butterfly, hot on the heels of a Broadway revival that starred Clive Owen and Jin Ha. We recently interviewed Hwang to find out more about the second life of M. Butterfly, in New York and at SCR.

Why did you decide to revisit the text of M. Butterfly for the 2017 Broadway revival?

Since the world premiere of this play in 1988, the way we think about gender has evolved dramatically. Similarly, the East-West power balance has continued to transform; 30 years ago, China, while rising, was not yet the superpower we know today. So I wanted to revisit the text to reflect both of these realities, telling the story through a less binary, more gender-fluid lens, while also trying to give the Chinese and Western perspectives more equal weight.

Although M. Butterfly isn’t a documentary, the plot of the revised text seems to more closely reflect the real-life relationship of Shi Pei Pu and Bernard Boursicot, on which the story is based. What pulled you in that direction?
Elements of the true story happened to fit nicely into my larger agenda. For instance, Shi Pei Pu was known for his performance in a Chinese opera called The Butterfly Lovers, which—while obviously also having “Butterfly” in its title—features a plot centered on gender confusion. So by interpolating elements of Butterfly Lovers alongside the references to Madame Butterfly, the revision boosts the Chinese perspective through both story and theatricality.

The play has some very astute observations about gendering—not just gendering individuals but entire cultures, as well. It must have been interesting to revisit the concept of gender fluidity and the toxic paternalism that permeates M. Butterfly, given how things have or haven’t changed in the country and the world since you wrote the play.

Some people feel that today, the East is no longer gendered as feminine to the West’s masculinity. However, I believe that Western stereotypes about Asia and Asians remain powerful and problematic. From Louis C.K.’s recent rant disparaging Asian masculinity, to the alt-right’s obsession with Asian women, to the notion that China’s economic rise can only be the result of “cheating,” old ways of looking at the world die hard.

How do you think the theatrical landscape in America has changed since M. Butterfly first opened?
Certainly American theatre has dealt more extensively with gender and sexual identity since M. Butterfly opened. Similarly, there has been an explosion of wonderful younger Asian-American playwrights and theatre-makers, our director Desdemona Chiang being a prime example. The former is one of the reasons Julie Taymor and I felt M. Butterfly could no longer turn so completely on the “surprise” of Song Liling’s “true” gender. I therefore sought in this version to make Song’s gender more ambiguous throughout.

You received one of the first commissions SCR ever gave to a playwright at an early point in your career (just before M. Butterfly became an international success). You’ve had a couple of productions here since then (Golden Child and Chinglish), and now we’ve come full circle by bringing M. Butterfly to SCR. Southern California is your original home, so is this a home-coming in some ways?
SCR has been a faithful and fruitful theatrical home for me, here in my hometown. Former Literary Manager Jerry Patch was the first person in a major not-for-profit theatre who wrote me a supportive letter about my plays, back when I was still an undergraduate in college.

Is there anything noteworthy about this production of M. Butterfly, after you’ve seen so many productions over the years? (I’m thinking of your comment that this is the first time a major production of your work will be directed by an Asian-American director—or maybe it was an Asian-American woman director?)
There have been countless productions of M. Butterfly, both in the U.S. and abroad, the vast majority of which I haven’t seen. As far as I’m aware, this is the first time my play will be directed by an Asian-American woman. I feel confident that Desdemona will bring new insights and perspectives to the work, helping to illuminate it further, even after all these decades.

Looking ahead, are there specific topics or ideas that you’re interested in writing about that you haven’t explored yet? If so, is there anything you’d be willing to talk about right now—just in a general sense?
Right now, I am primarily focused on bringing Soft Power, my collaboration with composer Jeanine Tesori that premiered at Center Theatre Group last spring, to New York City this fall. But I have at least two more major theatre projects I hope to make happen in the next few years.

Annika Alejo

is making her SCR debut. She is a recent graduate from the University of California, Irvine, where she double-majored and earned a BFA in dance performance and a BA in anthropology. She was a soloist and a member of the final Etude Ensemble to work with the late Donald McKayle; she performed McKayle’s historic works at his final memorial concert. Additionally, she has worked with Lar Lubovitch, performing his iconic repertory Marimba at the Irvine Barclay Theater. Last summer, Alejo trained globally with Vertigo Dance Company in Israel. In addition to concert dance, she has performed in musical theatre productions at The GEM Theater. She is represented by Go2Talent, one of Los Angeles’ leading commercial dance talent agencies. Outside of the arts, she is a certified yoga and pilates trainer.

Yoko Hasebe

is making her SCR debut. She started her dance training at the age of 7 at Koshizuka Natsuko Ballet Atelier (Saitama City, Japan), which gave her a strong foundation and formed her work ethic. She trained in ballet, contemporary dance and jazz. After graduating from high school, she attended the Japan University College of Arts as a dance major, where her passion for dance kept growing, as did her hunger to excel and learn different dance styles. When she learned about the large dance community in Los Angeles, and in order to broaden her experiences and accelerate her dance ability, she moved to the United States five years ago. She says it was the best decision she ever made because it gave her the opportunity to be featured in many performances here. After graduating Palomar College (San Marcos), she moved to Los Angeles and participated in the EDGE Performing Arts Center’s scholarship program. After finishing this program and signing with The Movement Talent Agency, she is excited to see where her career takes her.

Andres Lagang

is making both his South Coast Repertory and his professional debut. He recently earned his BA in theatre from UC-San Diego.

Sophy Zhao
Dancer

She was also a dancer in Grammy Award-winning violinist Miri Ben Ari’s latest music video, Quiet Storm. She recently graduated from NYU’s Tisch School of the Arts with a BFA in dance and a minor in anthropology. While at Tisch, she had the opportunity to perform works by Sean Curran, Pamela Pietro and Paul Taylor. During that time, she spent a summer studying in Berlin, Germany, and worked with renowned dancers and choreographers including Johannes Weiland, Ayman Harper, Meg Stuart, Judith Sánchez Ruíz and Dominique Duszynski.
